Rent a yacht for 24 hours.

The Apple TV competitor now lets you extend the 24-hour viewing window for movie downloads by another day, for a "discounted" price. It's a step in the right direction, but the fee is still too pricey.

The makers of the Vudu TV set-top box sent out an e-mail blast announcing the new feature, which comes in its latest firmware update (version 1.5).

So here's how it works: One the initial 24-hour viewing period for a movie has elapsed, you'll have a week to order another 24-hour window (or 48 hours, for Vudu movies that have a 48-hour viewing period) for the title.

You'll have to pony up for the privilege, however. For $5.99 HD movie rentals, extending the viewing window will cost you $3.99; for all other movies, you get $1 off the rental price (or 50 cents off 99-cent rentals).

Another condition: You can only extend a movie once; after that, you'll have to pay the full rental price to see the movie again.
